

Ozone on Track to Fully Recover

The United Nations (UN) say that the ozone layer should recover in the next 10 years.

The ozone layer is a layer of gases that surrounds our planet. It acts as a shield absorbing many harmful UV rays and stopping them from reaching the Earth. Without it, life on Earth would be almost impossible.

In the 1970s, scientists noticed that some of the chemicals humans had created were harming the ozone layer.

They found the chemicals that were doing the most damage were ones called CFCs.

CFCs weren't created to harm the planet. They were first invented to make fridges safer and better. They were also used in air conditioning and spray cans.

In the 1980s, a shocking discovery was made. A massive hole in the ozone layer had been created over Antarctica. It was getting in bits of the sun's harmful UV rays.

This was hurting the planet. Also, if the hole got a lot bigger, people would start being hurt by the UV rays passing through.

Governments around the world realised the danger and came in to fix the problem. They signed the Montreal Protocol which came into effect in 1989.

It worked and the ozone layer has been slowly recovering.

The UN says that over the next four decades, if the world continues to take action, the ozone layer will return to how it was before there was a hole.

They say that, over Antarctica, that should be by around 2036. Over the Arctic, it should only take until 2042 and for the rest of the world it should get there by 2060.

It makes the planet safer for us but also helps fight climate change.

Professor Robert Toole is the Secretary General of the World Meteorological Organisation. He said "Our success is showing not some-waiting chemicals down at what we

What is the Montreal Protocol?

- The Montreal Protocol is an agreement by different countries across the world to stop using chemicals that damage the ozone layer.
- It has been one of the most successful global environmental agreements ever made.

Prehistoric People Probably Did Wear Furs, Says Study

A team of archaeologists from the University of Tübingen say that humans have been using the fur of bears for more than 500,000 years.

The team uncovered the remains and skulls of a cave bear in Lower Saxony in Germany.

The bones had 'delicate' cut marks on them. According to researchers, this indicates that the animal was killed for its fur.

Researchers found bones, but none with cut marks.

Humans would have had to remove it as soon as the animal was killed. If it was left too long, the fur would begin falling out and no longer be usable.

This is not the first time that the site, known as Tübingen in Germany, has revealed information about the prehistoric period. The oldest known tools, including a set of wooden hunting tools, were found there including spears.

The relationship between cave bears and prehistoric humans has been debated for many years.

Perhaps this latest discovery will finally give them the answers they've been searching for.

What do we know about cave bears?

- Cave bears could measure up to three metres long and weigh up to a tonne! They were similar in size to polar bears.
- Their remains have been found across Europe and in Asia. Cave bears are believed to have become extinct around 25,000 years ago.

Normally, these cuts would mean that the animal was killed for its meat. However, the marks are just from very little meat on them. As a result, the team believes this means that the cuts were made when obtaining the skins for Researcher Jan Jauch said "These new discovered cut marks are an indication that about 500,000 years ago, people in north Europe were able to survive by wintering the past to warm their skins".

Archaeologists believe that the use of the fur shows how, long ago, humans adapted to life in harsh climates.
