Fryer,Richard T. Holden,2007 The United States Supreme Court has long recognized compactness as an important principle in assessing the constitutionality of political districting plans We propose a measure of compactness based on the distance between voters within the same district relative to the minimum distance achievable which we coin the relative proximity index We prove that any compactness measure which satisfies three desirable properties anonymity of voters efficient clustering and invariance to scale population density and number of districts ranks districting plans identically to our index We then calculate the relative proximity index for the 106th Congress requiring us to solve for each state s maximal compactness an NP hard problem Using two properties of maximally compact districts we prove they are power diagrams and develop an algorithm based on these insights The correlation between our index and the commonly used measures of dispersion and perimeter is 22 and 06 respectively We conclude by estimating seat vote curves under maximally compact districts for several large states The fraction of additional seats a party obtains when their average vote increases is significantly greater under maximally compact districting plans relative to the existing plans Index to IEEE Publications Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers,1995 Issues for 1973 cover the entire IEEE technical literature The Independent ,1984
