

1. Abstract Background: The literature suggests that the implementation of structural and policy changes in the workplace may reduce the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders (MSDs). However, the extent to which these changes are implemented is variable. This study examined the implementation of structural and policy changes in the workplace to reduce the prevalence of MSDs. Methods: The study used a mixed-methods approach, including a survey of 100 employees and 10 interviews with management. The survey examined the implementation of structural and policy changes in the workplace to reduce the prevalence of MSDs. The interviews examined the reasons for the implementation of these changes. Results: The survey results showed that 60% of employees reported that structural changes had been implemented, and 40% reported that policy changes had been implemented. The interview results showed that management implemented these changes to reduce the prevalence of MSDs and to improve the workplace environment. Conclusion: The study found that the implementation of structural and policy changes in the workplace can reduce the prevalence of MSDs. However, the extent to which these changes are implemented is variable. Further research is needed to determine the factors that influence the implementation of these changes.
