

anxiety and thus focus on and explore previously denied or distorted internal experience (Elliott, Watson, Goldman & Greenberg, 2004, p. 142; Rice, 1974, p. 292).

Problems are seen as stemming, in part, from how experience is constructed. That is, in addition to the non-acceptance of experience, problems are understood in terms of the dysregulation of emotion (being overwhelmed by it), as well as by maladaptive, painful emotional responses such as core fear and shame generated by earlier experiences.

Meaning is created by human activity, in dialogue with others, and people are seen as creators of the self they find themselves to be. Change occurs in part through the co-construction of new meaning in a dialogue between client and therapist. In this dialogue, the therapist plays an active role in confirming and validating clients' emotional experiencing, thereby helping them synthesize identity.

We distinguish between different types of emotional experience and expression in order to guide intervention. The four types of emotional experience are outlined below:

- Primary adaptive emotions. The normal function of emotion is to rapidly process complex situational information to provide feedback to the person about their reaction and to prepare them for effective action. Such uncomplicated responses are referred to as primary adaptive emotion responses. For example, if someone is threatening to harm your children, anger is an adaptive emotional response because it helps you take action to end the threat.

Not all emotions are as functional or fitting. The three types below generally are dysfunctional:

- Maladaptive primary emotions are direct reactions to past situations that no longer help the person cope constructively with the situations that elicit them in the present. Rather, they interfere with effective functioning. These responses generally involve overlearned reactions based on previous, often traumatic, experiences. For example, a fragile client may have learned that closeness was generally followed by physical or sexual abuse. Therefore, caring or closeness, as a potential violation, will be automatically responded to with anger and rejection.
- Secondary reactive emotions follow a primary response. People have reactions to their initial adaptive emotions and thus replace them with secondary emotions. Often people have reactions to their initial adaptive emotion so it is replaced with a secondary emotion. This 'reaction
