psychological processes over time. That is moving against the current of a long-standing tradition in western design theory and its work may well help transition design thinking, producing designs more accommodating to the users of these spaces." —Harry Nefz, Professor of Psychology, Clemson University

The topic is critical how to look at the environment as an experience, from ground level, as meaning, variable doing, rather than from above as fixed planners and administrators are wont to do otherwise. Their efforts at a way to do the university, with a mode of rotation and a body of theory which are closer to music and dance than anything else. Architects will read the well-great interest, but to be too self-affirming, monumental, homogeneous, homogeneous, and photographic, clear and programmatic and these can be dangerous. It will be read with interest how the process may be deconstructed for others who may find their own combination of attributes, identity, meaning, originally and meaning in the process of understanding and creating an experience of the physical world. —Michael Sweeney, Architect of the Environment, University of Texas at Austin
