A few years ago, Robbie and I adopted a year-old dog who had been abandoned. Our new family member, whom we named Cassie, seemed small to us—she was fully grown and weighed just 35 pounds. Previously, we'd owned an Irish setter and a Labrador, each of whom weighed about 70 pounds—twice Cassie's weight. A few weeks after Cassie joined us, my 10-year-old nephew, Harrison, visited.

When Harrison walked into our home, Cassie ran to meet the new person and shower him with kisses. "She's so big!" Harrison shrieked as Cassie jumped on him, putting her paws on his shoulders so that her head was even with his. "She's a big BC dog!" he announced, because we were accustomed to dogs twice Cassie's size, and because Robbie and I are adults. Cassie seemed small to us. But to a boy who weighed 45 pounds and was less than 5 feet tall, she seemed large! Our perceptions reflected our shared experiences and even our physical sizes.

This chapter focuses on perception, which is critical to our efforts to create meaning as we communicate with ourselves and others. Perception is the process by which we notice and make sense of phenomena. To explore the relationships between perception and communication, this chapter discusses three interrelated levels of perception and examines influences on how people perceive and why their perceptions differ in their perceptions. We will then discuss perception and digital media. To conclude the chapter, we will identify ways to improve perception.

The Perception Process

Perception is the active process of selecting, organizing, and interpreting people, objects, events, situations, and activities. The first thing to notice in this definition is that perception is an active process. We are not passive receivers of what is "out there" in the external world. Instead, we select certain things to notice, and then we organize and interpret what we have subjectively noticed. What something seems to us depends on which aspects of it we attend to and how we organize and interpret what we notice.

Perception and communication influence each other. Perception shapes our understanding of others' communication and the choices we make in our own communication. For example, if you perceive a co-worker as hostile, you are more likely to notice his or her rudimentary behaviors than friendly ones and, as a result, to communicate defensively or to minimize interaction. Communication also influences our perceptions of people and situations. The language and nonverbal behaviors that other people use affect our perceptions of their intelligence, honesty, attractiveness, and so forth.

The second important aspect of the definition is that perception consists of three interrelated processes: selection, organization, and interpretation. These processes blend into one another. We organize perceptions even as we select what to perceive, and we interpret as we organize. Each process affects the other two. What we notice about people and situations influences how we interpret them. Also, our interpretation of a person or situation directs us to selectively notice certain, and not other, aspects of the person or setting.

perception is the process of selecting, organizing, and interpreting people, objects, events, situations, and activities.
