Persimmon Sunday Ken Hada:

Persimmon Sunday Ken Hada, 2015-12-15 With none of the cloying sentimentality of some so called nature poets Hada writes of the natural world as we actually experience it Few poets since Robert Frost have spoken as clearly and movingly about our attraction to and alienation from the natural world that surrounds us even when we can't be said to be fully in it In these poems the speaker is both the man standing on his stoop looking up at stars as tree frogs chortle and the man who hears the birds more distantly now as he walks tiredly back down the road he has helped to clear and to pave In the haunting Two Deer at Twilight it is the total otherness of the natural world its inaccessibility to us that makes the poet love it all the more as if he were a troubadour and nature his cruel mistress In Redbirds Balancing on a Cedar Limb the poet freely admits that Their song is a temporary fix something to keep other things away I am glad he doesn't trust me he says in another poem of the Roadrunner he has frightened from his back door Again and again Hada finds poignancy in our strained but indispensable relationship with the natural world This is the book of poems to tuck into your rucksack before heading into the woods the book to read on your porch on a clear fall evening as the lights dim around you This is also the book to carry with you on the bus train or taxi into the heart of the busy city where you just might need it the most Benjamin Myers
