Modern Drama

Drama, which had fallen out of favour during the Victorian era, was resurrected with vigour at the start of the twentieth century, and during the next six decades, several trends and currents in twentieth-century drama emerged. In terms of technique, the theatre of the English Modernist Movement was far less original than its poetry and novels.

Features of Modern Drama

Realism: In modern English drama, realism is the most important and prominent feature. Naturalism piqued the attention of early twentieth-century dramatists, who sought to address real-life issues in realistic ways in their works. The Norwegian writer Henrik Ibsen is credited with popularising realism in modern theatre. In his play, he dealt realistically with real-life concerns. Robertson Arthur Jones, Galsworthy, and G. B. Shaw all wrote plays based on his example. The Problem Play is a product of modern theatre, and many modern dramatists have created a number of problem plays in recent years. In their plays, they addressed issues such as marriage, justice, law, administration, and labor-management conflict. They utilised theatre to effect social improvements in their day. A Doll's House, by
