These estimates are supported by the fact that the international development programs have established the same pattern of increased needs which the developed nations have neglected to supply. The estimates of the UNCTAD Secretariat for 1970-71 are $10.5 billion.

These estimates, however, figure only the minimum. Many Third World States have identified other needs, such as health, education, urban housing, and agricultural development. The UNCTAD Secretariat has estimated that the minimum needs for the 123 developing countries for 1970-71 are $15.5 billion. The UNCTAD Secretariat's estimate of $10.5 billion for 1970-71 is based on the assumption that the developed nations will contribute 50 percent of the total needs, which would be $5.25 billion.

Whether or not the UNCTAD Secretariat's estimate is correct, the fact remains that the developed nations have neglected to supply the minimum needs of the developing nations. The UNCTAD Secretariat's estimate of $10.5 billion for 1970-71 is based on the assumption that the developed nations will contribute 50 percent of the total needs, which would be $5.25 billion.

Admission of the fact that the developed nations have neglected to supply the minimum needs of the developing nations is a necessary first step in the process of international development.

Stress levels in the workplace are rising, according to a new study by the American Psychological Association. The study, which was conducted by a team of researchers from the University of California, San Diego, found that stress levels have increased significantly since 1980. The researchers found that stress levels were highest among those who were employed in the service sector, and lowest among those who were employed in the manufacturing sector. The researchers also found that stress levels were highest among those who were employed in the public sector, and lowest among those who were employed in the private sector. The researchers concluded that the increase in stress levels is likely due to a number of factors, including the increasing pace of work, the increasing complexity of work, and the increasing pressure to perform. The researchers also noted that stress levels are likely to continue to rise in the future, unless steps are taken to address the underlying causes of the problem.
