

Herbal remedies for children

Learn how to choose gentle, mild herbs with soothing properties to ease many childhood ailments and hasten your child's recovery.

Babies receive healing chemicals contained in herbal remedies via their mother's milk, along with protective natural antibodies. Once children stop breast-feeding, however, their immature immune systems leave them susceptible to respiratory and other viral infections. Luckily, herbs such as echinacea, elderberry and rosehip can give their immune response a boost.

Cuts and scrapes

This is not the only herbal benefit available to children (and their parents!); a chamomile infusion soothes a hyperactive child, while used as a compress or balm it is a natural antiseptic for cuts and grazes. Many herbs ease the growing pains of childhood, although you do have to be aware of special considerations when administering natural medicines to little ones.

Children may need to be encouraged to take unfamiliar herbs, so choose mild ones such as chamomile or administer as a cordial or cream.

Special considerations

Reduce the standard dosage of herbal remedies to suit the age of the child.

6 mths – 1 year	5% of adult dose
1 year – 3 years	10% of adult dose
3 – 5 years	20% of adult dose
5 – 10 years	50% of adult dose
11 – 15 years	80% of adult dose
15 years +	full adult dose

Be careful when administering herbal remedies to your child that the dose and the ingredients are suitable.

SPECIAL ADVICE FOR TREATING BABIES

- ✦ Don't give herbs to babies under 6 months without professional consultation.
- ✦ Infants can become ill rapidly. Seek emergency attention for fever above 39°C, diarrhoea, vomiting or breathing difficulties.
- ✦ Honey is an ideal way to administer herbs to children, but is not recommended for infants under one year. It can induce serious food poisoning in babies.
