1992). The authors also found that the use of a single, unidimensional measure of self-esteem was insufficient to capture the complexity of the construct. They argued that self-esteem is a multidimensional construct that includes both global and specific self-esteem. Global self-esteem refers to a general sense of self-worth, while specific self-esteem refers to a sense of self-worth in a particular domain (e.g., academic achievement). The authors suggested that a multidimensional measure of self-esteem, such as the Self-Concept Scale (SCS; Rosenberg, 1965), would be a more appropriate measure for this study. The SCS is a 25-item scale that measures self-esteem across five domains: academic achievement, social relationships, physical appearance, intellectual ability, and emotional stability. The authors found that the SCS was a more reliable and valid measure of self-esteem than a single-item measure.
