Consultants, Inc,1995 Unified Methodology for Airport Pavement Analysis and Design. Volume 1. State of the Art ,1991 This report presents an assessment of the state of the art of airport pavement analysis and design The objective is to identify those areas in current airport pavement analysis methodology that need to be substantially improved from the perspective of airport pavement design and management needs The report presents a rational argument for developing a unified pavement analysis and design procedure that can be used for pavements of any material type including reinforced concrete and asphalt and that are based on mathematical formulations of the actual stress strain response processes in airport pavement materials Material behaviors can be difficult to predict with respect to their structural response to loads and environmental conditions Material characteristics change with time environmental conditions and stress strain relations and history There is no consensus definition of airport pavement failure Design procedures prescribe a pavement thickness for protecting subgrades from excessive deformation Fatigue cracking of pavements is a relatively common occurrence but cracking alone is not necessarily an indication of failure Pavement failure May be defined with respect to the serviceability level a concept related to the roughness of the traveling surfaces Pavement Design: Materials, Analysis, and Highways M. Kansas Rigid Pavement Analysis Following New Mechanistic-empirical Design Guide ,2005 The AASHTO Guide for Design of Pavement Structures is the primary document used by the state highway agencies to design new and rehabilitated highway pavements Currently the Kansas Department of Transportation KDOT uses the 1993 edition of the AASHTO pavement design guide based on empirical performance equations for the design of Jointed Plain Concrete Pavements JPCP However the newly released Mechanistic Empirical Pavement Design Guide MEPDG provides methodologies for mechanistic empirical pavement design while accounting for local materials environmental conditions and actual highway traffic load distribution by means of axle load spectra The major objective of this study was to predict pavement distresses from the MEPDG design analysis for selected in service JPCP projects in Kansas Five roadway sections designed by KDOT and three long term pavement performance LTPP sections in Kansas were analyzed Project specific construction materials climatic and traffic data were also generated in the study Typical examples of axle load spectra calculations from the existing Weigh in Motion WIM data were provided Vehicle class and hourly truck traffic distributions were also derived from Automatic Vehicle Classification AVC data provided by KDOT The predicted output variables IRI percent slabs cracked and faulting values were compared with those obtained during annual pavement management system PMS condition survey done by KDOT A sensitivity analysis was also performed to determine the sensitivity of the output variables due to variations in the key input parameters used in the design process Finally the interaction of selected significant factors through statistical analysis was identified to find the effect on current KDOT specifications for rigid pavement construction The results showed that IRI was the most sensitive output For most projects in this study the predicted IRI was similar to the measured values MEPDG analysis showed minimal or no faulting and was confirmed by visual observation Only a few projects showed some cracking It was also observed that the MEPDG outputs were very sensitive to some specific traffic material and construction input parameters such as average daily truck traffic truck percentages dowel diameter tied concrete shoulder widened lane slab thickness coefficient of thermal expansion compressive strength base type etc Statistical analysis results showed that the current KDOT Percent Within Limits PWL specifications for concrete pavement construction are more sensitive to the concrete strength than to the slab thickness Concrete slab thickness strength and truck traffic significantly influence the distresses predicted by MEPDG in most cases The interactions among these factors are also almost always evident
