Fritz and Tommy

Across the Barbed Wire

Peter Doyle and Robin Schäfer

The war between ‘Fritz’ and ‘Tommy’ – respectively German and British soldiers¹ – commenced once the British Expeditionary Force, landing in France in early August 1914, took up its pre-determined position in the line in support of the French. From this point on, the armies of both nations would develop their own soldiers’ speech – Soldatensprache or ‘trench slang’ – which would be continuously shaped through four years of war. It is interesting to compare the natures of these languages, of their differences, their similarities and their emergence through the shared experience of the war. In this essay, we examine aspects of the languages of the two foes, considering both their commonality and their differences. This paper represents, as far as we know, the first attempt to compare the development of ‘war slang’ in the two armies. As such it very much represents a first step in the wider comparative exploration of two distinct ‘trench languages’. In writing this essay, we draw upon our work exploring the shared experience of the British and German troops on the Western Front (Doyle and Schäfer 2015).

Arriving on the continent, British soldiers were taken in by the sights, sounds and smells, the waving crowds, the strange accents. As regulars, many of the British troops had experienced the rigours of international duties, and had acted as guardians of empire in far-flung outposts, across India, in Africa, the Caribbean and even the Mediterranean. They were used to foreign postings; after all, over half the British army of 1914 was spread overseas. And they were well trained. In the aftermath of the disastrous opening campaigns of the Anglo-Boer War of 1899–1902, when the Boer citizen-soldiers had painfully exposed the inadequacies of the British regular army, things had been tightened up considerably. And yet that next foe would be one of the most highly organized, efficient and powerful of European nations – one that had been described by
