

MENTAL HEALTH

Read the story and answer the question on page two.

I am an "expert". At least in the sense that as a specialist medical doctor in mental health I am asked to give expert advice, included in expert advisory groups, and if I give evidence in court, it's taken as expert evidence.

Annie, for instance, came to see me about a distressing situation. She was at school and suddenly felt really unwell. She said she couldn't breathe properly and her heart was racing. She told me that she didn't want anyone to notice so she went to the bathroom where she increasingly felt like something terrible was about to happen. Maybe a heart attack – there was pain in her chest. She couldn't come out of the bathroom because she was crying. It was getting harder to go to school or even to go out with her friends.

The doctor told her she should avoid going to hospital when this happens because tests are unnecessary, expensive and unhelpful for anxiety. She was given a prescription for medication. When she googled the tablets she was given, the search results showed they were antidepressant medications. She felt even more anxious and low about herself. When I saw Annie, she had lots of questions about why this was happening. She felt as if she wasn't the person she was being treated as and she didn't know where to get help.

At the moment, The number of teenagers in mental health crisis has reached record levels in England, analysis of NHS data by the mental health charity YoungMinds shows.

Laura Bunt, the chief executive of YoungMinds, said the figures tell us that the "system is broken and the government has refused to listen to young people demanding change". "We are now in a mental health emergency and the government must act soon. Many young people are having to wait months and years to access help, while many others are told they can't access mental health services. No young person should be left waiting for help while their mental health worsens."

Dr Elaine Lockhart, a specialist in mental health problems in teenagers, says that "services are doing their best to meet this rise in demand for treatment but a lack of staff and resources is making it difficult for them to see patients quickly".

As a result of this, if we, people, politicians and the society in general, don't take the situation seriously and provide our Health System with the resources to cope with it, teenagers will continue to suffer the consequences of our indifference. Mental health should be one of our immediate priorities.
