

PEPPERED MOTTH INVESTIGATION

! Please report answers from different colors !

PART 1

The peppered moth (Biston betularia) is the subject of a famous experiment that tested natural selection. In 1858, the English naturalist Charles Darwin published a paper that argued that a slowly occurring change in species characteristics over generations, especially those for the survival of the fittest, produced the most favorable survival advantages among the fittest individuals. Darwin's paper laid the basis for the concept of natural selection.

In the experiment, you will observe the effects of natural selection on the peppered moth in a forest of birches. The white moth is common in unpolluted areas, but the dark moth is common in areas where the environment has been changed by pollution. A population of the white moth is released in an unpolluted area, and a population of the dark moth is released in a polluted area.

The experiment measures the rate of change in the number of moths in a population over a period of time. The results are reported in the table below. The table shows the number of moths in a population over a period of time.

Year	White Moths	Dark Moths
1952	146	23
1957	135	27
1962	120	30
1967	115	35
1972	110	40
1977	105	45
1982	100	50
1987	95	55
1992	90	60
1997	85	65
