Permaculture is not just a set of farming techniques, but also a philosophy and a way of life. One of the key principles of permaculture is to work with, rather than against, nature. This means designing agricultural systems that are regenerative, self-sustaining, and resilient.

Permaculture is guided by three main ethics:

1. Care for the earth: This means recognizing that the natural world has intrinsic value and that we have a responsibility to protect and preserve it.
2. Care for people: This means ensuring that basic human needs such as food, shelter, and community are met, while also promoting social justice and equity.
3. Fair share: This means using resources wisely and ensuring that surplus resources are redistributed to those in need, rather than hoarded by a few.

In addition to these ethics, there are also several key principles that guide permaculture design.

These principles include:

1. Observe and interact: This means taking the time to observe the natural world and understand how different elements interact with each other.
2. Catch and store energy: This means capturing and storing energy in the form of sunlight, water, and wind, and using it to power agricultural systems.
3. Obtain a yield: This means designing agricultural systems that provide a surplus of food, fuel, and other resources, while also meeting the needs of the ecosystem.
4. Apply self-regulation and accept feedback: This means designing agricultural systems that can regulate themselves, rather than relying on external inputs such as pesticides and fertilizers.
5. Use and value renewable resources and services: This means prioritizing renewable resources such as solar and wind power, and using natural systems such as pollination and soil fertility.
6. Produce no waste: This means designing agricultural systems that minimize waste, reuse resources, and recycle nutrients.
