Mapped Mysteries - Setting

Name: _____

Set the stage for a suspense-filled mystery!

Where will your mystery begin? Choose a place. Then make some notes about that place to help you describe it to your audience.

As your mystery progresses, maybe the action will move to another location. Even if they stay in the same location, things may change or be moved. Make some notes about the new location or changes in the opening setting.

Mapped Mysteries - Developing Characters

Name: _____

As you develop your characters, consider how they will look, what they will do, what they will say, and additional evidence.

- How the Character Looks - This is the least important characteristic to develop. You may, however, use a character's physical characteristics to throw your audience off the track. For example, a rule like "get away from me" might be the culprit. Since this is a mystery story, you should add small details that lead your audience to the solution (or keep them off track). For example, shiny eyes or shaky hands makes a character seem nervous - or even guilty.
- What the Character Does - You've probably heard that "actions speak louder than words." Consider what your character will do. This can make them seem guilty or innocent.
- What the Character Says - What a character says - and how they say it - makes a mystery come to life. Instead of telling the whole story upfront, let your characters tell part of it. Be sure to give each of them a special way of speaking that gives them personality.
- Additional Evidence - Little things like gross stains on the bottom of a character's pants or windows that provide even more evidence.

Mapped Mysteries - Developing Plot

Name: _____

Most detective stories have plots that are mapped. The events in the story develop clue after clue. Some are real clues, others are false clues, or red herrings. As a mystery writer, you must make a clear path of evidence from the mystery to the solution.
