Essays on Digital Marketing and AI-generated Content Meng Ji (Lecturer in marketing), 2025 In Chapter 1 I investigate how spatial proximity can affect consumers purchase behaviors and how an ecommerce platform can leverage this effect to increase sales Spatial proximity defined as geographic closeness of consumers plays a significant role in their purchase behavior However existing literature mainly focuses on its effect on new product adoption while largely ignoring other consumer decisions such as purchase quantity and inter purchase time which are equally critical for online retail operations Further the impact of consumer spatial proximity on supply side marketing strategies as well as its dynamics and heterogeneous impact remains understudied Based on social identity theory this study examines these issues using a unique dataset from a leading ecommerce platform in Hong Kong The results indicate that consumer to consumer C

C spatial proximity has a significant impact on consumer online purchases when and how much to buy and the platform's marketing strategies price and promotion and that such effects can change over time Further significant heterogeneity exists across consumers and product categories with different levels of social identity The findings suggest that the focal platform can increase its annual revenue by more than 5 218 541 an increase of 6 37% by using C C spatial proximity based price and promotion strategies for one category personal care and health alone Consequently this study provides important theoretical and managerial implications for marketing researchers and practitioners in online retail operations In Chapter 2 I study the impact of generative AI GenAI disclosure policies As a disruptive innovation the emergence of GenAI has fundamentally transformed how users create content affecting not only individual behavior but also audience responses and the broader dynamics of social media platforms Despite its growing influence the existing literature has yet to fully examine the implications of GenAI disclosure on these platforms To address this gap our research leverages TikTok's official rollout of a labeling function for AI generated content to evaluate the effects of this policy Using a synthetic difference in differences SDID approach we investigate several key questions how the policy affects influencers strategic decisions such as their likelihood of using GenAI the quantity of their content and the length of their posts how it influences consumer engagement with AI generated content as measured by the volume and sentiment of comments what the dynamic impacts of the policy are over time and how influencer status moderates these effects Our empirical results show that influencers use of GenAI dropped significantly after the policy announcement While the length of posts increased the overall quantity of content remained relatively stable On the demand side consumers engaged more with AI generated content evidenced by a rise in comment volume However the sentiment of these comments became more negative following the policy change Our research provides important managerial implications for platform managers policymakers and content creators facing evolving landscape of AI assisted content creation
