Accountability of Google and other businesses in Colombia Newman, Vivian, Ángel, María Paula, 2019-11-01 In this document we analyze the privacy policies of 30 companies with data driven business models that collect data in Colombia and identify practices that have not been sufficiently contemplated by the personal data protection regime currently applicable in our country. But what has been done in Colombia to guarantee these rights in the digital economy framework? In this document we explore the degree of preparedness of our legal personal data protection regime and data protection authorities for tackling the risks that the digital era poses to different values and rights, thereby holding accountable the companies with data driven business models (DDBM). From the review of their privacy policies we analyze the modus operandi of an illustrative sample of 30 DDBM among which are included for their economic, technological and social power the so called GAFAM: Google, Apple, Facebook, Amazon and Microsoft. After this analysis we identify several practices that have not been sufficiently contemplated by the personal data protection regime currently applicable in Colombia and whose regulation in comparison with the European GDPR and the CCPA of California has significant room for improvement Likewise we identify several shortcomings in the capacities of the Colombian data protection authorities in holding the DDBM accountable and therefore propose some corrective measures
