

Following the Leader: The History of Early Childhood

Interviews are highly sensitive. I have found interviewees, especially white males and police, and the character of questions, as formulated, would elicit the responses I am interested in. I have learned to trust all those involved in the process. From the "interviews" of police, I learned that officers' feelings about minorities in their police ranks changed through the last 100 years. I have learned to immediately identify racialized and gendered meanings. I have learned to listen and to hear. When minority clients experience their own history of racism, I recognize the importance of a culturally sensitive practice as the first and foremost step in providing and receiving care within this white patriarchy.
